Maps.

What useful things maps are; what aids to knowledge; what helps to a correct understanding of regions and countries about which we know little; what means of augmenting general knowledge—and yet how few, even those who are well informed, appreciate their importance among the means of diffusing information and keeping people posted.

The adventurer and explorer visit new regions; and, better than their best written descriptions, are the maps which give us of the newly discovered lands. Captain John Smith, after having visited New England in 1614, of which country he styled himself "Admiral," published a map of the same for the benefit of his patron the "high and mighty Prince Charles, prince of Great Britian"; and Stanley the famous modern explorer makes clear to his readers the wonders of interior Africa, by his map delineations of the country traversed in his remarkable journeys—in each and every case explorers are thus adding to the general stock of knowledge by this means.

The old Egyptians had some knowledge of maps, for Sesostris, one of their early kings caused the territories he possessed and had conquered to be represented on tablets for the information of his subjects; and it is clear from a record in the book of Joshua that the Israelites also possessed the same knowledge, for that law-giver ordered the map to be made of the land occupied by the several tribes. Herodotus, who wrote about 460 years before Christ, speaks of maps that were constructed by the Persians as early as the reign of the first Darius, Strabo, a Greek geographer who flourished 54 years before Christ, and Ptolemy who lived in the second century of the Christian era, were for many centuries the chief authorities in geography; and it was not until 1700 that their errors and exaggerations were corrected through the observations and astronomical calculations of Paul de Lisle, who may be regarded as the father of the comparatively modern system of map making. Sea-charts are believed to have been the invention of Anaximander of Miletus, 570 B. C., and they were brought to England by Bartholemew Columbus to illustrate his brothers' theory of a western continent in 1489.

The first maps, it may reasonably be presumed were very rude affairs, and the earliest ones in existence of which we have close copies in modern historical works give us a good idea of their quaintness, and the very scanty details of information they give.

Among these are the sketches of the coast line from Florida to Labrador made by Pedro de Alvarado, parlor bouquets; 1st, G. M. Rossiter; 2d, A. B. Chapman; 3d, S. R. Sweetser; 4d, A. B. Chapman.
